Technical Information

EN471 High Visibility Clothing

For a garment to be classed as “Hi Visibility” For a garment to be classed as “Hi Visibility”, it must conform to the European Standard EN 471. Within the EN 471 classification system, garments are grouped into three sub-classes according to the level of conspicuity they provide. These groupings are determined by the amount of background fabric & retroreflective material that has been used in the construction of the garment.

Class 1: Lowest Level of Protection

Class 1 garments are suitable for minimal risk, off-road activities in which increased visibility is an advantage. The minimum required quantity of background material is 0.14m², and the minimum quantity of retroreflective material is 0.10m². Bands of retroreflective material must not be less than 50mm wide.

Class 2: Intermediate Level of Protection

For a garment to be rated as a Class 2 item, the minimum required quantity of background material is 0.5m², and the minimum required quantity of retroreflective material is 0.13m². Bands of retroreflective material must not be less than 50mm wide.

Class 3: Highest Level of Protection

Class 3 garments offer the greatest level of hi-visibility protection. The minimum required quantity of background material is 0.8m², and the minimum required quantity of retroreflective material is 0.2m². Bands of retroreflective material must not be less than 50mm wide.

EN13982-1 Disposable Boilersuit

Standard EN 13982-1 relates to disposable chemical suits, specifically those described as offering Type 5 protection. Type 5 coveralls are required to offer protection against solid particulates, in order to test this, the garment is placed in an enclosed space into which an airborne particulate is released. The quantity of stimulant found on the inside of the suit is then measured and compared with the requirements of the standard in order to determine a pass or fail result. Specific tests relating to abrasion and flex resistance are also carried out as part of EN 13982-1, the coverall must pass all aspects of the testing process in order to be considered a Type 5 garment.
